as editors toby litt and ali smith explain in their introduction newness is quite a venerable category there's not much that's new about it in the 1930s when a magazine called new writing was first published it had to compete with new signatures new country new verse the new statesman and nation and new theatre and what with the new woman of the 1890s and new everything else even then new wasn't the new new if we've achieved diversity it's because our submissions were themselves diverse and the final selection is representative of the proportion of short stories to novel extracts poems and essays that were submitted originality is only proven over time paradoxically we are confident that some of the names here you've never heard before will become very familiar they may even disgrace themselves by winning prizes becoming established etc but they'll be the kinds of writer like the known names published here for whom everything they write is a renewal of language of place of the senses and of the contemporary everything toby litt touches turns to gold
